

ENVY, OR FEELING OF UNFAIRNESS, AMONG MONKEYS

(Mason,)

In a famous experiment, three monkeys were caged together. Two of them were fed regularly, whereas the third was deprived from food. The victim became obviously sad. In order to find out whether this state was caused merely by food deprivation, a new experiment was devised with the same subject. This time the third monkey was given pellets devoid of nutritional value and, though hungry, he was not unhappy. Apparently what had saddened him in the first experiment was his ~~xxxxxxxxxxxx~~ awareness that he had been the object of an unfair discrimination.
