

VALUES: BIOLOGICAL, PSYCHOLOGICAL, AND SOCIAL

Some things are valuable not because they fulfil a biological or a psychological need of the individual but because they favor certain social activities or relations. For example, gold is valuable in a market economy but was useless to Robinson on his island; the transit police are useful, hence valuable, in the center of a great town, but useless in an eskimo hamlet;

In 83066
FT 227