

MORALITY, SCIENCE & RELIGION

It is often stated that we need religion because science does not know values, purposes and choices. This presupposes an obsolete and narrow construal of 'science', namely as physics and chemistry. Biology must face biological value, psychology psychological value, and social science social value (see Vol. 4). Psychology and social science study also purpose, choice, and plan. So, science does study the value sphere, and it does not have to regard values and purposes as God-given or mysterious.
